Columns are found from the white space that runs down the page between blocks of text, and the reader goes down one column first.

A paragraph starts where a line is indented from the left edge of its column.

The second column is read after the first one, even when the content stream draws the lines across both columns in turn.

Extra space between lines also starts a new paragraph here.